

Attn FCC,

Good Afternoon.

I am a freshmen at college majoring in telecommunications so this topic interests me a great deal. I am writing to confirm my opinion on the subject of violence in television. I believe that a person can willingly change a channel if they feel it is too risque for their viewing pleasure. With this said, my opinion is that there is not too much violence on television.

For years, children have imitated their heroes that they see on television; Batman, Power Rangers, and Superman are some that are the most imitated. Recently, it has been brought up that children are imitating not just their heroes, but other scenes that are shown on television; children are now beginning to act like they have guns, that they can gamble, and that they are pro. wrestlers. Well, in defense to the entire argument, there use to be a thing called a remote control. If parents are worried about what their children see on television, then change the channel. If they do not want to control what their children see, then they can easily explain to them that those guns really are not killing the "bad guys," gambling isn't legal at their age, and those big, muscular, wrestlers wreslte for a living, a controlled living environment.

In conclusion, I believe that no boundaries are being crossed with the programming on television. I urge the angry parents to actually take control of the situation in their own household rather than trying to take down a new era in nation-wide programming; they should block risque channels or take the time to explain what their kids see on television and make sure the children know the difference between real and fake.

Thank you for your time and consideration.
